ABSTRACT

A study investigated whether trade books labeled "easy reader" consistently conform to specific sight word lists and to what degree the vocabulary in those books matches that in K-2 basals. Ten "easy reader" books were chosen at random from each of three publishers. Three popular sight word lists were matched separately to every one of the words in the 30 trade books and the vocabulary in the books was compared to the vocabulary in three K-2 basals. Results indicated that most words found in the sight word lists were consistently represented in the trade books and that the vocabulary in all three basals have a high correlation to the vocabulary in the "easy reader" books. (Six tables of data are included; 15 references; a list of the trade books investigated, word lists, and extensive appendixes of raw data are attached.) (RS)

ABSTRACT

The purpose of this study was twofold. First, do trade books labeled "easy reader" consistently conform to specific sight word lists? Second, to what degree does the vocabulary in the "easy reader" books match the vocabulary in K-2 basals?

Ten books specifically labeled "easy reader" were chosen at random from each of three publishers for a total of thirty books. Three popular sight word lists, Dolch, Dale Johnson, and Fry New Instant 300 were matched separately to every one of the words in the thirty trade books. To analyze results, percentages were calculated and a comparison made which indicated that most words found in the three sight word lists chosen were consistently represented in the thirty trade books. Next the vocabulary in the same thirty books were compared to the vocabulary in the K-2 basals of Macmillan, Houghton-Mifflin, and Scott-Foresman. Results showed that the vocabulary in all three basals have a high correlation to the vocabulary in the "easy reader" books. Houghton-Mifflin was shown to have the greatest similarity.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to express my appreciation to my family, especially my husband Bill for his support while I was writing this thesis. Three special notes of thanks go to my daughter Donna and my seventh grade class for helping with word counts and to my brother Rick Biunno for the use of his computer plus his invaluable assistance in helping me obtain my related research.

Also, thank you to Dr. Mazurkiewicz for his assistance throughout this project.

"Normal communication through the flow of printed language requires the pupil to deal with words - the bricks which build the house of language." (Durr, 1973)

Sight words are words that occur in the English language with such frequency that children must be able to recognize them instantly so that reading fluency is not interrupted. These words appear over and over again in printed material and oral language for children and adults. (Johnson, 1980) Furthermore, they help make possible a focus on meaning as well as decoding in early reading and serve as a basis for analytic phonics instruction. (Chester, 1972)

We know that the ultimate goal of communication can only take place through the flow of language using syntax, semantics, and intonations in our reading and speaking. (Durr, 1973) Learning relatively few of these high frequency words and practicing them extensively to insure these words become permanently fixed to a level of instant recognition will insure that flow which becomes so important in reading and speaking.

In the early primary grades teachers rely almost exclusively on basal readers to teach vocabulary that corresponds to the stories written predominantly for those readers. Many sight words or early high frequency words parallel sight word lists published by various educators. This is acceptable, but if the ultimate goal for the teacher is to gradually guide her students into reading trade books at an independent level, there is a need to make sure that the high frequency words of basals parallel to a high degree that of "easy reader" books that are being published. Selectivity at the beginning of reading instruction ought to insure a child has mastered high frequency words that s/he will meet in early free reading time; while he's reading interesting content with similar vocabulary in his/her developmental reading program. (Durr, 1973)

Most published sight word lists base their frequency on basal readers. On the other hand, Durr, (1973) and Eeds (1985) stressed the importance of developing lists from favorite children's trade books. It seems then that a study of high frequency words the basal readers use today compared with the vocabulary in trade books, especially those labeled "easy readers" would be beneficial to primary grade teachers.

Hypothesis

To provide evidence concerning this topic, a study was conducted on the hypothesis that the books that are labeled "easy reader" do not consistently conform to specific sight word lists, particularly those published by Dolch, Fry, and Dale Johnson; and therefore cannot be considered a viable supplement to today's first and second grade basals.

Definitions

Sight words - Words that occur in the English language with such frequency that children must be able to recognize them instantly so that reading fluency is not disrupted.

Sight Word Lists - The most frequently used sight words published in list form.

Easy Readers - Books specifically designed with carefully written, simple stories, and a short, repetitive vocabulary. The young reader will be able to read it by him/herself.

Trade Books - A book published for and sold to the general public.

Procedures

Harper and Row, Greenwillow, and Macmillan were selected as the publishers of the trade books used in this study. Each publishes specific stories under an "easy reader" label. They are Harper and Row, I Can Read; Greenwillow, Read-alone; and Macmillan, Ready to Read. Ten books with a copyright date no earlier than 1970 were chosen at random from each of the three publishers for a total of thirty books. It was assumed that these books were a representative sampling of the most recent "easy readers" from these companies. A number from 1 - 30 was assigned to each. Then an alphabetical listing of words from each book was gathered.

Three popular sight word lists, Dolch, Dale Johnson, and Fry New Instant 300 were chosen and alphabetized. Each sight word list was compared separately to the vocabulary found in every one of the thirty trade books. The sight word list was then put on the left hand column of a master sheet with the numbers 1 - 30 representing the thirty trade books across the top. Checks were placed in each grid when a word from a book matched a sight word on a particular list, and a dash when no match was made. If a word in a book had a suffix of s, ed, or ing with no root word change, it was assumed that the word would be recognized and therefore, was checked as a match. The only exception came when the sight word list specifically gave a root word and then also listed it with a specific suffix. When compiling the words from the trade books, no proper names were used with the exception of Mr., Mrs., America, or American as they were mentioned on at least one sight word list.

A second listing was compiled comparing the same thirty trade books to all words learned in three basal readers from pre-primer through level 2-2. The basal series chosen were as follows: Scott Foresman, 1988, Macmillan, 1986, and Houghton-Mifflin, 1986.

The final comparison was done between each of the three sight lists and all of the words in each of the three basals. The chart and checklist procedure was used.

Results

To analyze results, percentages were calculated and a comparison made between words found in the three sight word lists with those words found in thirty "easy reader" books.

Table I illustrates the high correlation between all three sight word lists with those words in the thirty trade books.

Table I

Comparison of Words Found in Three Sight Word Lists with Words Found in Thirty "Easy Reader" Books

Lists	Dolch	Fry	Dale Johnson
Total Number of Words per List	220	300	304
Percentage of words found in "easy reader" books	99	97	96

A second comparison was done to find the frequency of usage of the sight words within the thirty trade books as reported in Table I.

Table II

Percentage of Word Usage Between Sight Word Lists and Easy Reader Books

Lists	Easy Reader Books
	0-5	6-10	11-15	16-20	21-25	26-30
Dolch	19	16	20	14	15	16
Fry	28	19	16	13	13	11
Dale Johnson	27	23	15	13	11	11

Words on the Dolch list are repeated in at least 16-30 books 45% of the time. The Fry list shows a 37% frequency and the Dale Johnson list is represented 35% of the time.

The same results that were analyzed in Tables I and II are shown in Tables III and IV with the difference being that the comparison is shown between the three sight word lists and the three basals.

Table III

Comparison of Words Found in Three Basal Lists with Words Found in Thirty Easy Reader Books

Lists	Houghton-Mifflin	Macmillan	Scott-Foresman
Total Number of Words in Books	616	500	835
Percentage of words found in Easy Reader Books	90	79	74

Table III shows a 9:1 ratio in the match between the words in the "easy reader" books with the words in the Houghton-Mifflin basal. Macmillan and Scott-Foresman show approximately a 4:1 ratio.

In Table IV the correlation between the Houghton-Mifflin vocabulary and the vocabulary of the "easy reader" books repeated in 16-30 of the books shows a 17% usage. Although 90% of the words in the Houghton-Mifflin books are repeated in the thirty trade books, the match in over sixteen books is small. Similarly Macmillan and Scott-Foresman show a match between lists fewer than 25% of the time.

Table IV

Percentage of Word Usage Between Three Basals (K-2) and Easy Reader Books

	Easy Reader Books
Basals	0-5	6-10	11-15	16-20	21-25	26-30
Houghton-Mifflin	56	18	9	6	6	5
Macmillan	59	12	10	6	9	4
Scott-Foresman	67	13	8	5	4	3

How many sight words from each of the three lists are taught within the three basals? Table V shows that Scott-Foresman teaches the greatest number of sight words within its K-2 basals, with almost all of the words in the Dolch list incorporated into the Scott-Foresman vocabulary. Macmillan uses sight word vocabulary less frequently than Scott-Foresman or Houghton-Mifflin.

Table V

Comparison of Words Found in Three Basals with Words Found on Three Sight Word Lists

	Houghton-Mifflin	Macmillan	Scott-Foresman
Fry	84%	62%	84%
Dolch	87%	77%	97%
Dale Johnson	78%	62%	79%

To find out how the three sight word lists compared with each other, a count was made to determine which words appeared on one list, two, or all three. This information is shown in Table VI.

Table VI

Comparison of Words Found on Three Sight Word Lists (Dolch, Fry, and Dale Johnson)

Percentage of Words on One List	Percentage of Words on Two Lists	Percentage of Words on All Three Lists
37	26	37

Results show that there is a significant correlation between all three sight word lists. About two thirds of the sight words can be found on at least two of the lists.

Finally, the top sixteen words (those matched in 28-30 easy reader books) are as follows: in, the, to, but, it, a, I, of, are, for, is, like, not, there, was, and you.

Conclusions

In reviewing the results of this study it was found that most words found in the three sight word lists chosen were consistently matched in the thirty represented trade books. The words on the Dolch Basic Sight Word List were found in 16-30 books almost half of the time, whereas the Fry and Dale Johnson list words were matched one third of the time. Within the constraints of this study it can be said that a significant percentage of sight words on three lists are used in trade books; therefore, these books could be used to teach sight vocabulary.

In comparing basals to "easy reader" books, Houghton-Mifflin had the greatest percentage of words represented in the trade books, followed by Macmillan and Scott-Foresman. The indications are that the vocabulary in basals and trade books have a significant correlation with and can be used as a supplement to basals.

VOCABULARY COUNTS: RELATED RESEARCH

An interest in counting words goes back to the ancient Greeks. In the present century, over 100 word counts are reported in English research. Lists of words compiled on the basis of their frequency of occurrence in writings of various kinds have long been considered "basic" materials for reading instruction. (Groff, 1976) Furthermore, they help make possible a focus on meaning as well as decoding in early reading, and at the same time can serve as a basis for analytic phonics instruction. A good sight word list should include words that occur with demonstrated frequency in material for beginning readers and continue to occur frequently in materials of higher levels of difficulty. (Chester, 1972) Most counts deal with a limited number of words that are used most frequently and; therefore, are thought to be very important for success in early reading. (Hillerich, 1983)

Since numerous word counts have been made it would seem important to note if any of the lists represent the real world of language that children should be reading. Also it is said that teachers should use word lists because the child learns how to read better if the order of the words is determined by how frequently they will be encountered in reading materials.

In a study of many of these word lists it is noted that they are not developed from newly uncovered evidence, but from previously published lists. Many researchers believe that if a word is common to several basic word lists it is more basic than if it were found only in a single list. (Groff, 1976)

The most well known of all vocabulary lists is the one developed by Dolch in 1941. (Reich, 1979) The Dolch list is actually made up of two lists. The first 220 words make up his basic list and are relatively context-free, that is they do not rely on surrounding words for meaning. These words would be encountered by a child in a wide variety of reading materials. Nouns are excluded on this list. A list of 95 most frequently used nouns make up Dolch's second list. The Dolch list is the only list to distinguish between types of words. It can be argued that some words on Dolch's list are not context-free and words that can function as a noun might also be used as a verb, or a noun could also be an adjective. Dolch's list can be broken down into two other categories, function words - pronouns, articles, prepositions, and conjunctions - which specify relationships among the components of a sentence, and content words - nouns, verbs, adjectives, and adverbs - which describe the topic being discussed. (Durkin, 1980) It will be found that when comparing Dolch's list to others there is a great deal of overlapping among function words, but a wide variation on content words. (Reich, 1979)

The Dolch Basic Sight Word List has served as a resource list for the development of reading materials, as a basis for placement testing, and as a handy tool for remedial reading teachers. (Chester, 1972) Dolch compiled his list in the 1930's from three lists that were current at the time. He found 193 words were common to all three of the following lists and 27 more were added that appeared on one or two lists but seemed to belong. The three lists were:

1. The International Kindergarten Union Vocabulary List. Published in 1928 this list included 2,596 words that the child study committee found to be common to the vocabulary of children entering first grade.
2. The Gates Primary Word List. Published in 1926 it included 1,811 words considered important in children's reading.
3. The Wheeler-Howell First Grade Vocabulary List. This list contained 453 words found in ten primers and ten first grade readers published in the 1920's. Chester, 1972)

Dale Johnson (1971) questioned the validity of the Dolch list. He compared the list with "adult" materials and found that 82 Dolch words, or 37% of the entire list, were not among the 220 most frequent words on the Kucera-Francis list. Therefore, Johnson suggested "A Basic Vocabulary for Beginning Reading" which is drawn from the Kucera-Francis list and a compilation of words in the spontaneous speaking vocabulary of children in the primary grades by Murphy and associates. The list includes every word that was used at least 50 times by the kindergarten or first grade children in the Murphy study and was one of the 500 most frequent words in the Kucera-Francis study. (Chester, 1972) Thus the 306 words chosen were among the 500 most frequently occurring words in printed English and they were in the speaking listening vocabulary of kindergarten children. (Johnson, 1980)

In 1976 Johnson and Majer divided the 306 words into two lists. One hundred eighty words became first grade words and the other 126 were second grade words. They were determined because they were known by at least 70% of the children at that grade level. Also in 1976 Johnson and Smith analyzed five widely used basal reading series to determine the occurrence of words in their first and second grade materials. 99% of the Johnson Word List occurred in at least one of the series, but 93% of first grade words and 87% of the second grade words occurred in all five series. They concluded that teachers who use basal readers can feel confident that these sight words are likely to occur in the program they are using. (Johnson, 1980)

Another check was made on the suitability of the Dolch list because it had been criticized as being outdated. The purpose of the study was to determine the rankings of the first 150 Dolch words in four other ranked word lists and three word list studies of basal readers. (Follman, 1974) The most striking finding of this study was that regardless of the methods used to compile the various lists, the readability level of the materials used, or the type of materials analyzed, the basic or most common words obtained were essentially the same. All but a few of the first 150 words of the Dolch list appeared in Johnson's 306 word list, Otto's 500 word list, and the first 500 words of the Carroll and Kucera list. The Dolch list was found to contain the same common words as the recent studies. (Follman, 1974)

Another highly regarded list is the Harris-Jacobson list. It covers materials for grades one through six and is based on the total vocabularies of complete books instead of 500 word samples. It is based on the vocabularies of basal readers rather than on miscellaneous materials and contains only root words. It is arranged in difficulty levels from preprimer through grade six. It also provides information on where the word first appears in each of the fourteen textbook series. The Harris-Jacobson Core preprimer, primer, and first reader lists provide a compact list of 332 high utility root words which appear in half or more of the series at first grade levels. (Harris, 1973)

Another prominent researcher, Edward Fry, made his first basic sight word list in 1957. This list contained the most common words in English in rough rank order based on studies by Rinsland (1945), Dolch (1941), Thorndike and Lorge (1944) and others. (Fry, 1980) In 1980 Fry published a new list known as the "New Instant Word List" which is based on a frequency count of over five million running words appearing in 500 word samples taken from 1,045 different books in twelve subject matter areas ranging from English to vocational education used in grades 3 through 9. Samples were also taken from library books and magazines. Fry states that these words particularly those at the higher frequency end of the list, although taken from materials for grades 3 - 9, are for beginning readers of any age 6 -8 years as well as remedial students in the middle or secondary grades and adult functional illiterates. The first ten words in his list make up approximately 24% of all written material. The first 100 words make up about 50%, and the 300 New Instant Words and their common variants make up 65% of all the words in any textbook, newspaper, or writing sample in English. (Estill, 1988) Fry believes that it is impossible to achieve fluency in reading or writing unless these words are known "instantly."

Hillerich (1983) compared four major lists compiled from an uncontrolled vocabulary, that is from written or published material over which there was no effort to limit or control vocabulary. Four studies were used:

1. Carroll, Davies and Richmond's The American Heritage Word Frequency List. The count was based on printed school texts, grades 3 - 9 in 1969. This was also the basis for the Fry New Instant Word List.

2. Hillerich's Analysis of Words Used in Creative Writing, Grades 1 - 6. This count was based on children's creative writing in grades 1 - 6 during the 1965 - 1966 school year.
3. Kucera & Francis' Computational Analysis of Present Day American English. This count was based on 500 samples from fifteen categories of adult printed materials was done in 1964.
4. Rinsland's A Basic Vocabulary of Elementary School Children was based on children's writing, grades 1 - 8, from 1936 - 1945.

Five hundred of the most frequently used words in each of the four lists were then compared. Hillerich found that these words differed more by source than by the date of a published list. For example, 113 words on the Kucera & Francis list within the first 500 weren't on other lists. These were termed business words. Forty eight words were unique to Carroll's list, for example following direction words. A list should be compiled from a variety of sources, Hillerich said. Words should be found that are common to all. From these four sources 190 words were found to represent 70% of all words used by children in their writing and over half of the words used were in adult printed material.

To these lists Hillerich also added the list of Durr (1973), a count of 188 words most frequently used in primary library books, Dolch's 220 basic sight words, and the rank of first or second 500 from the Thorndike count (1944). He believed that perhaps there should be several kinds of basic children's writing vocabulary; Horn for a future or adult writing vocabulary, Dolch and/or Durr for a children's reading vocabulary, and Kucera/Francis and or Carroll for a future or adult reading.

A number of researchers and writers, Curtis, 1938, Hockett, 1938, and Stone, 1939 and 1941 studied the utility of various words. They agree in general concerning the percentage of total running words and concluded that the percentage of total running words for each specific number of words is likely to be slightly higher for beginning reading materials and slightly lower for adult reading materials. (Ekwall, 1988) The importance of learning to read and spell high utility words was emphasized by Richard Madden in a 1959 study. Madden demonstrated that there is little value in trying to teach students to read or spell words of lower utility until they have completely mastered the word of higher utility, according to Ekwall, 1988.

Hillerich made the point that if pupils are going to be reading in a variety of materials, not just basals, than it is important to include words in lists other than those exclusively in basals. If only basal readers are used the word selections will be different because each series has their own vocabulary. In comparing basal reader vocabulary at the primary level different researchers have found that they don't agree on more than about 100 words. This seems to be supported in a study done by Olson. He analyzed the vocabulary in seven different reading series published from the late 50's to the early 70's. He found that only 12% of the words were common to five or more of the series. (Reich, 1979) It is important to note then, that if teachers want supplementary readers, if they choose another basal the dissimilarity of the vocabulary can be a problem. With this lack of agreement about vocabulary there is as much difference between any two basal reading programs at the primer level as there is between any of the "beginning-to-read" library books. If this is the case, a library book might just as well be used. (Hillerich, 1983)

Within the span of 50 years publishers of basals have supplied various kinds of vocabulary information for primary grade readers: for example the number of running words, the number of different words, the average repetition per word and the proportion of books total vocabulary that is included in standard lists of common words. In comparison with basals of the 20's and 30's to those in the late 50's a more restricted vocabulary and repetition of words continued. In the 1970's the trend was towards a richer and more varied vocabulary. (Harris, 1972) In 1938 Gates & Russel said "It would appear that there is ample evidence for a controlled vocabulary for most children through second grade." The newer basal programs have less stringent control. Therefore, it is assumed that word lists based on readers popular in 1970 may reflect a trend toward less exacting control over basal reader vocabulary. (Harris,1972)

William Durr (1973) found that there was a void in word frequency studies in the use of library books that primary grade children select for free choice reading. The results of several studies previously explored have been used in preparing developmental reading materials for primary grade children: Thorndike-Lorge (1944), Rinsland (1945), Dolch (1941), Spache (1958), and Stone (1956). Thorndike-Lorge summarized four differernt counts, none included children's literature. Rinsland's list was based on words children use in writing, not reading and Dolch used words common to three word other lists. Durr felt there was a need for an up-to-date vocabulary list which concentrates on books primary grade children select themselves. There is a need to find the specific words that young readers might encounter when given free reading time. This would be helpful in several ways:

1. It would enable teachers and authors of developmental reading programs to concentrate on relatively high frequency words in building a reading vocabulary for a beginning reader.

2. If some words are found to occur a large percentage of time, developing these words to instaneous recognition would insure that a young reader could read a large percentage of his selected books with ease. Also the student would be better prepared to use contextual clues together with grapheme phoneme correspondences to decode those words he didn't recognize instantly. (Durr, 1973)

To obtain a representative sampling of high frequency words, Durr used books that were popular with primary grade children, books that they read during free reading time. Children's librarians were contacted in 40 communities with populations ranging from ten thousand to several million. Librarians were randomly selected and represented communities from a variety of geographic areas. The list was eventually narrowed down on the basis of frequency of listing and teacher judgment based on the librarians' lists. Eighty titles were finally selected and analyzed. Durr found that in the 80 studied, ten words were of such high frequency that a young reader could expect to meet one in nearly every four words read. Durr further stated that the 188 high frequency words he listed, although making up only 6% of all the different words found, made up nearly 70% of the running words in print in the 80 library books he studied. (Ekwall, 1988)

In an attempt to convince teachers to incorporate individualized reading based on the use of children's books outside the basal program, Maryann Eeds (1985) set out to make a word list based on today's children's books. Ultimately a list of 227 primary words were developed which she labeled "Bookwords."

In order to identify a list of high frequency words for teaching beginning reading with children's books, Eeds first identified a list of over 1,000 primary level children's books that had been recommended by at least one authoritative source - including children. She used lists from established texts for teaching children's literature and lists of "best of the best" published by the School Library Journal and lists of children's recommendations from The Reading Teacher's annual "Children's Choices." Four hundred books were included with a total of about 120,000 running words.

Eeds compared her list with Durr (1973) since he also used trade books as the source for his study. Durr's books were chosen from lists, submitted by librarians. His 80 books generated 105,280 running words; therefore, they were not beginning books. Also they were books chosen by children who could already read, so this list may be more appropriate for upper primary or intermediate level children rather than for beginners. (Eeds, 1985) The Bookwords reflect frequency of occurrence in books that can be used at the very beginning of reading instruction. There is a considerable overlap in content, but not in order of frequency, between Eeds list and Durr's. Some words are on the Bookword list but not on Durr's. (Eeds, 1985)

From all studies of related research on vocabulary counts, it seems that most lists are useful because they are all similar. In separate studies by Follman and Lowe (1974) both found that the Dolch list is as useful today and contains the same common words as other studies. The Lowe work documented the high degree of similarity between basic word lists derived from a variety of sources. Regardless of the type of material, the level of material, or whether sampling or word counts were made, basic words are about the same. Whether a list is over 40 years old seems to make little difference simply because the language it was derived from has remained essentially the same. Hillerich's 1983 study seems to concur. He concluded that words differed more by source than by the date of the published list.

Research seemed to be lacking in the specific area of the relationship between sight words emphasized in basals and those in children's literature. Studies done by Durr (1973) and Eeds (1985) were the only two found that attempted to use children's literature to make new word lists. They did not specifically set out to compare words in children's books with existing lists and modern, established basals. Reading could have a broader impact if the vocabulary in library books and reading texts showed similarities. Using the library books as motivational and for enrichment activities produce not just a pupil who can read, but one who does read.
